James Van Horn Melton is Professor of History at Emory University and was president of the Central European History Society from 2012 to 2013. His research has focused on early modern Germany and Austria as well as Enlightenment Europe and the Atlantic World. Most recently, he published Religion, Community, and Slavery on the Colonial Southern Frontier (2015), which was awarded the Austrian Studies Book Prize for the best book in the field. The book follows a group of German-speaking migrants who settled in the frontier community of Ebenezer in colonial Georgia after fleeing religious persecution in Salzburg, tracing both their transatlantic journey and their encounter with slavery in the borderlands of British North America.
